

The Washington Post

Morning Links: Chicago police accused of manipulating crime data

By Radley Balko

April 21, 2014

- Apparently, powdered alcohol is coming soon to a store near you. Cue moral panic in 4 . . . 3 . . . 2 . . .
- Chicago Magazine investigation finds that Chicago police may be juking their crime statistics.
- Walter Olson on the criminalization of poverty.
- Minnesotans say Iowa City, Iowa, police unjustly confiscated \$48,000 in a forfeiture action after a traffic stop.
- Headline of the day.
- Mass surveillance system borrowed from the military was tested on Compton, Calif., residents without their consent.
- Every member of Congress gets a monthly porn delivery.

Radley Balko is a senior writer and investigative reporter for the Huffington Post, where he covers civil liberties and the criminal justice system. Balko's work on paramilitary raids and the overuse of SWAT teams was featured in The New York Times, has been praised by outlets ranging from Human Events to the Daily Kos, and was cited by Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer's dissent in the case Hudson v. Michigan. Balko is also credited with bringing national attention to the case of Cory Maye, a black man who prior to Balko's work was on death row in Mississippi for shooting and killing a white police officer during a raid on Maye's home. Balko's Reason feature on Maye was also cited in an opinion by the Mississippi State Supreme Court. National Journal also profiled Balko's coverage of the case. Balko's November 2007 investigative report on Mississippi medical examiner Steven Hayne won second place in the investigative reporting category for the 2007 Los Angeles Press Club awards. Balko was formerly a policy analyst with the Cato Institute. He has been a columnist for FoxNews.com, a senior editor at Reason, and has been published in The Wall Street Journal, Playboy, Time, The Washington Post, Los Angeles Times, Slate, Forbes, ESPN, the National Post, Worth and numerous other publications. Balko has also appeared on the BBC, CNN, CNBC, Fox News Channel, MSNBC and NPR. Balko publishes the personal blog, TheAgitator.com. He graduated from Indiana University with a degree in journalism and political science.