

Whores Hustling

By mistermix July 25th, 2012

Here are some libertarians protecting freedom:

In the brief, TechFreedom, The Competitive Enterprise Institute, The Free State Foundation, and the Cato Institute argue that the last year's FCC net neutrality order "Preserving the Open Internet" (PDF), which took effect in November 2011, violates the First and Fifth Amendments, and that the FCC lacks jurisdictional authority to implement such a rule.

Specifically, the groups say that compelling private companies to "speak," by requiring them to carry all traffic across their networks, instead of allowing them to discriminate as they see fit, violates the principle of freedom of speech.

The papers are full of stories of oligopoly ISPs being waterboarded and beaten with rubber batons to get them to carry Netflix traffic. And we all remember the mass lock ups that preceded the implementation of BGP. I'm glad that Cato and other respected, independent Libertarian think tanks are leading the charge to protect these downtrodden members of society.

In solidarity with the ISPs, I've gone to this site to demand that Atlas Shrugged Part 2 be shown in my town to educate the moochers and looters who inhabit this city.