

Cannon on PolitiFact's "Lie of the Year"

At the beginning of the year, our own Zach Holiday took on the "fact checking" website PolitiFact's "Lie of the Year," noting that it wasn't they got it wrong. Yesterday, Michael Cannon, a health policy expert from the Cato Institute, also laid into PolitiFact:

ObamaCare is not a government takeover, I learned from PolitiFact, because it "uses the private health insurance system to expand health care coverage."

But wait. In my research, I found that distinction between public and private to be illusory: what difference is there between a public system where the government taxes and spends your money, and a "private" system where the government forces you to spend your money in the same way?

"It is irrelevant," I wrote, "whether we describe medical resources (e.g., hospitals, employees) as 'public' or 'private.' What matters – what determines real as opposed to nominal ownership – is who controls the resources." I detailed how making private health insurance compulsory – as ObamaCare does – "would give government as much control over the nation's health care sector as a compulsory government program."

I even quoted President Obama's health adviser Jeanne Lambrew, who acknowledges, "the government role in socialized medicine systems ranges from complete government ownership and salaried facilities and providers to public financing of private insurance and providers" (emphasis added) – which is exactly how ObamaCare operates.

Were these lies too? We may never know: PolitiFact failed to consider whether the public/private distinction might be misleading.

Fortunately, others have. Left-leaning columnist Michael Kinsley wrote of ObamaCare: "If the government requires insurers to accept all customers and charge all the same price, regulates all aspects of their marketing to make sure they aren't discriminating, and then redistributes the profits to make sure that no company gets penalized unfairly, in what sense is the industry still 'private'?"

The Congressional Budget Office wrote that if ObamaCare's minimum "medical-loss ratio" requirement were just 5 percentage points higher, private insurance would become "an essentially governmental program."

This "government takeover" business wasn't the first time PolitiFact warned me about telling lies.

After Sarah Palin's (in)famous "death panels" bombshell, I wrote – take a deep breath, now – that what she said was actually quite plausible. President Obama had just proposed a government panel that, under standard principles of administrative law, would have the power to ration medical care just as Palin predicted. For support, I quoted a former Medicare administrator and other Medicare scholars.

When PolitiFact dubbed “death panels” their Lie of the Year for 2009, I presented their fact-checkers with this potentially exculpatory evidence. They showed no interest.

From my vantage point, the evidence shows that ObamaCare is a government takeover of health care, and Sarah Palin’s “death panels” claim was essentially true. If that makes me Liar of the Year, so be it.

Wonder if PolitiFact will revisit their “Lie of the Year,” which is in fact the lie of the year.
