

Trump: Taste the rainbow of hatred

Drew Sheneman

September 23, 2016

I don't know much about Donald Trump Jr. I know he has a weak chin and a Gordon Gecko haircut. I know he likes murdering big game animals from the back of a Range Rover and now I know he likes mathematically inaccurate, racist memes.

The larval-stage spawn of Trump posted a meme comparing Syrian refugees fleeing a war-torn land besieged by the greatest humanitarian crisis of the past half century to Skittles, an overrated "fruit" flavored candy.

The aforementioned meme states that allowing refugees to enter the country poses a singular risk to our national security. This is a demonstrably false statement made even more galling by the fact that it was posted by the always damp looking son of the one man who, in reality, poses the greatest current risk to our national security.

According to the Cato Institute the chances of an American being killed in a terror attack carried out by a refugee are 1 in 3.64 billion.

The chances of Trump becoming leader of the free world are now 1 in 2.

He can't find Crimea on a map but he might be president. That notion should be far more frightening to Americans than the specter of Syrian refugees as poison confections.