

Here's The Big Lie Of The Day From The Paris Climate Summit

Kerry Jackson

December 2, 2015

Keeping track of all the lies coming out of the Paris climate summit is a enormous task. Thankfully, the fellows at the Cato Institute are going to do that so we don't have to.

The first lie — called the Paris Whopper of the Day — was the story told to French President Francois Hollande that the Sahara Desert is expanding. Cato climate scientist Patrick Michaels says this simply isn't true and points out that the southern side of the Sahara has been getting much greener over time.

"In fact," writes Michaels, "that's the largest 'greening' on the entire planet earth!"

Lying about global warming is just a part of the fear the alarmists whip up. Check out these five big lies . Then take a look at what federal agencies are feeding us.

Naturally, the propaganda has to start early, and it needs to be in schoolbooks, so that the kids will doubt their own eyes as they grow up.

So, what will the next big lie out of Paris be? Impossible to say, but we can be reasonably sure that its size will be in proportion to the desperation that the alarmists are feeling.