A Question on Posthumous Baptism

by Jason Kuznicki on March 3, 2012

If posthumous baptism is a laudable spiritual practice, then I propose a shortcut. The Mormons could save a little time and just baptize me right away.

No, I have absolutely no intention of following their religion. I have no more intention, one might even say, than a dead guy. Intentionality doesn't seem to matter in baptism — just the fact of having been born, which I also share with every dead guy — so why don't they?
