December 6, 2010 - The Energy Primer for Kids: With a Primer for Grown-Ups, by author Vladislav Bevc, has received positive endorsements from both the Cato and Heartland Institutes.

The Cato Institute's Patrick J. Michaels says, "This concise book teaches not only science, but how to think about science. It needs to be our primary schools, where it will provide the perfect antidote for the green bilge that has flooded public education." Patrick J. Michaels is a Distinguished Senior Fellow at George Mason University's School of Public Policy.

Heartland's Science Director, Jay Lehr, reports that "This informative and important 57-page soft cover book encourages young people to bring critical thinking and criteria to the subject of questionable new energy technologies, and our need to address their viability. Proposed solutions such as electric cars, solar and wind power, biologically produced combustibles, renewable fuels and hydrogen are presented and shown to be lacking true economic potential. Youth, and their parents, are invited to sift through the deluge of information intelligently to make informed energy policy decisions as citizens and voters.

Dr. Jack Dvorkin, Senior Research Fellow at Stanford University says that this book 'arms children and grownups alike with simple, rational, science-based facts that will let them make their own decisions and form independent opinions about the controversial issue of energy reserves, its generation and consumption now and in the future.'

A wonderful piece of philosophy the book treats the young readers to is contained in the following quote: 'The main problem humanity has is men who want to dominate us all. Such men appear time and again claiming that they can solve problems most people do not understand. They tell the people that if they only followed them and did everything they command, the problem would go away. History shows that nothing has ever been solved by such men and that they have invariably caused great misfortune to humanity.' This statement preceded an excellent explanation of the global warming fraud. This book would make a great stocking stuffer for Christmas."
