Cato's Roger Pilon: Issues in Obamacare still in play

From Roger Pilon at the libertarian Cato Institute:

Even though the Supreme Court action today is a setback for those of us who've fought for decades to revive limited constitutional government, it's hardly the end of the road. The ideas this litigation put in play – in the court decisions below, in the oral arguments before the Supreme Court, and in the huge debate that has taken place across the country – will not go away. They're the ideas of limited constitutional government that are as compelling today as they were when the Founders first articulated them over two centuries ago, even if this court has found itself unable to give them force in this case.

But it's not simply that the ideas are now "out of the bottle" as they haven't been for a very long time. More deeply, it's because they address the fundamental problem the nation faces today – out-of-control government, at all levels, giving us a looming economic disaster – that they'll increasingly be in play. After today's decision, it will fall to the people themselves, who've opposed this legislation from the beginning, to elect a Congress that stands for restoring limited constitutional government, such that a future court will be better able to do what this court should have done.
