Hanke is only part right in his explanation of the empirical FACT of negative multipliers. Government deficit spending constitutes a real misallocation of resources and mispent wealth, regardless of anyone's confidence. You could put a confidence drug into the nation's water supply, and deficit spending (government consuming available capital to make nonmarket political purchases) would still be detrimental to the overall economy both through the wasting of resources needed to build a productive economy, and through the support of resource-consuming anti-productive economic activities.

Steve Horwitz writes: "Libertarians believe in human rights, not just citizens' rights or Americans' rights. People everywhere have, or should have, the right to travel where they wish and to contract for work with whomever they wish."

May I conclude that Prof. Roberts is thus absolutely no libertarian, considering how happy he is to justify even blokkades ...

I love the links. It's like the Drudge Report with native content and comments. More links!
Your site stands head and shoulders over Drudge, if you ignore that pesky 125MM page views per day ...
