

A Critical Moment for The American Conservative

Posted on August 6th, 2010 by Daniel McCarthy

We're nearing the end of our online fundraising drive, but we're still a little more than $5,000 short our goal. As the progress bar fills up, it's easy for readers to think that the effort is going so well that their help is not essential. But it is essential — the last portion is by far the hardest to raise, and although it might not seem like a lot of money (it's not, when divided up among scores or hundreds of donors) the shortfall would be enough to put serious dent in our operations. It's the equivalent of a full issue of print magazine content, or more than four weeks of web content.

Help us meet our goal so we can continue to bring you the best in thoughtful conservatism — please make a tax-deductible contribution.

TAC brings you news you won't find in other conservative media, such as Jack Hunter's report today on Clint Didier, a Washington state Republican who openly identifies as a non-interventionist. Our commitment to sharp and fearless analysis is also on display in Justin Logan's "An Empire, If You Can Keep It," which we've newly made available online, and this week's Web-exclusive articles on copyright and remix culture, rising conservative discontent with the foreign policy of Bush and Obama, and how the welfare state's anti-male bias is transforming the economy.

You've made these stories and more possible with your support. Keep it coming and help us make it to the finish line.