Climate change skeptics say recently reveals emails between scientists at the University of East Anglia's Climate Research Unit show that researchers fudged data on global warming and sought to discredit skeptics by attempting to ban their papers from scientific journals. Cato Institute's Patrick Michaels who was mentioned in the hacked emails, tells Clean Skies News he was target because of his opposition to climate change theory.

Former minister MP Peter Lilley discusses on RT the scandal dubbed Climategate, after the University of East Anglia's Climate Research Unit (CRU) servers were hacked into, bringing to public attention many emails and documents from scientists that suggest data on climate change has been manipulated to suit the Global Warming "Theory".

Some of the world's leading climate scientists have been embarrassed by the publication of hundreds of private emails & research documents, stolen by computer hackers from a British university. Climate change skeptics have hailed the material as proof that research data has been skewed and suppressed.

This is important information because the Copenhagen Treaty is about organising to bring in global governance and global carbon taxes using "climate change" as the vehicle. If this turns out to be a "climategate", the hoax of global warming is brought to public light.

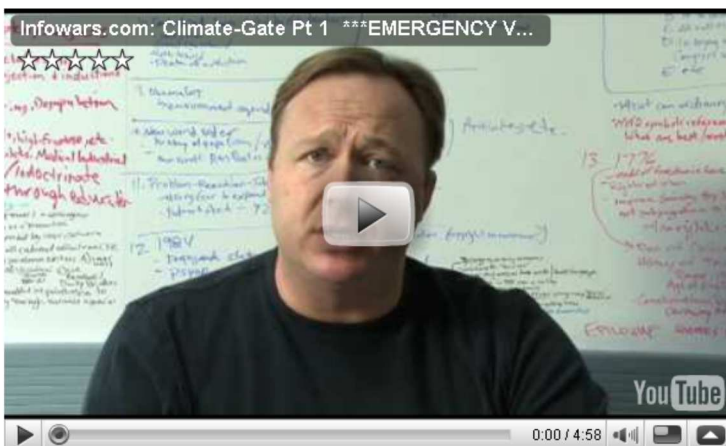

This report features Andrew Bolt (Herald-Sun columnist) who gives his comments on it, whilst Professor Andy Pitman (Climate Change Research Centre UNSW) dismisses & minimises the contents of the emails.

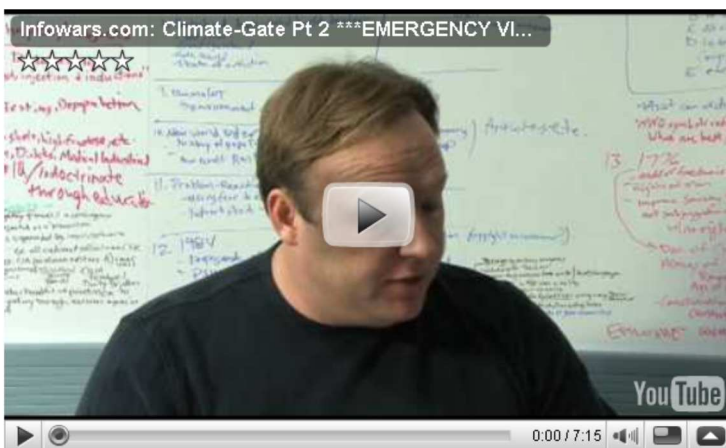

Climategate demonstrates the collusion of CRU staff, scientists and journalists to manipulate climate science to fit their statist warming agenda in the release of hacked emails stored on one of the Climate Research Unit's servers.

Retired climatologist Dr. Tim Ball joins us to discuss the significance of the recently leaked emails and documents from the Climate Research Unit at East Anglia University which expose deceit, duplicity and collusion between climate researchers to maintain the fraud of the manmade global warming theory. These emails reveal stunning behind-the-scenes details about how this fraud has been developed and perpetuated, and Dr. Ball shares his insights on what they show.
