Chavez arrests head of last independent media outlet

Venezuela takes yet another step towards becoming a Sean Penn Paradise. Hugo Chavez had Guillermo Zuloaga, president of Globovision Television, arrested for allegedly making offensive comments about Chavez, a crime in Hugo's fiefdom these days. And it's not the only significant person now in prison for insulting the President-for-Life, either:

Today, the Venezuelan government arrested Guillermo Zuloaga, president of Globovision Television, the only remaining television on public airwaves critical of Hugo Chavez. According to the government, Zuloaga made offensive comments about Chavez (which is against the law in Venezuela) while speaking at a conference of the Inter-American Press Association (IAPA) in Aruba, where media representatives criticized the Venezuelan regime's crackdown on freedom of speech. ...

"It is becoming a crime to have an opinion." That's how Carlos Zuloaga summed it up this afternoon when he referred to this incident and the recent arrest of former Venezuelan state governor Oswaldo Alvarez Paz for having said during a Globovision interview that Venezuela has become a drug-trafficking haven.

How will hemispheric leaders and the Organization of American States react to this renewed attack on free speech in Venezuela?

Hemispheric leaders such as the Castro Brothers and Daniel Ortega? I'd doubt we'll hear much from them. After all, Cuba has done much worse to its internal critics, and Nicaragua isn't following too far behind Chavez now.

How about hemispheric leader Barack Obama? Our President intervened when Honduras took action against Manuel Zelaya's attempted power grab by ... siding with Zelaya, and with Chavez, the Castro Brothers, and Ortega. But if the case of Zuloaga doesn't generate some outrage from the White House, how about the case of Oswaldo Alvarez Paz, the opposition leader jailed under the same statute?

Chávez's crony courts have charged Álvarez Paz with conspiracy, "public instigation of criminality" and "spreading false information"—crimes that could draw sentences of 13 to 27 years. Álvarez Paz was indicted for televised statements on March 8 acknowledging the fact that Venezuela has become a haven for drug trafficking and citing accusations by a Spanish court that the Chávez regime supports Basque and Colombian terrorists.

Álvarez Paz's real crime is that of being the clear-headed conscience of Venezuela's opposition. The 67-year-old former governor of the State of Zulia who sought his party's presidential nomination in 1993, Álvarez Paz has gained notoriety for his weekly columns in which he chronicles his country's tragic, inexorable march to dictatorship under Chávez.

Laughably, the government of Venezuela sent out this press release on Wednesday (I'm somehow on their mailing list) attempting to defend Alvarez Paz' arrest:

- 1) This case is a legal one, not a political one. Mr. Alvarez Paz's detention comes as a consequence of a court's granting of an arrest warrant for an alleged criminal act. The warrant was granted in accordance with provisions of the Organic Penal Process Code (Código Orgánico Procesal Penal, or COPP, in Spanish), specifically those outlined in Articles 296-A, 132 and 285.
- 2) Mr. Alvarez Paz was arrested and charged with the crimes of conspiracy, public incitement to delinquency and dissemination of false information.
- 3) Mr. Alvarez Paz enjoys all the constitutional rights, protections and guarantees granted to all Venezuelan citizens, including the right to a defense. In an interview after his detention, Mr. Alvarez Paz confirmed to the press that his legal rights have been maintained.
- 4) Today preliminary proceedings court no. 25 ruled that Mr. Alvarez Paz should remain detained during the investigation of this case due to fears of his possible flight from the country.
- 5) That this case is being openly discussed inside Venezuela serves as evidence of the freedom of expression that exists in the country.

Sure! Venezuelans are very obviously free to express the entire gamut of political thought that exists between support of Hugo Chavez and absolute, slavish devotion to Hugo Chavez. The only thing missing here is the assignment of rectal cancer to Alvarez and Zuloaga. Since Obama saw fit to interfere in an internal issue in Honduras, where's the outrage over Chavez' political inquisition in Venezuela?

Update: Slightly off topic, but my good friend Val Prieto of Babalublog is covering a massive protest rally against the Cuban government in Florida, led by Gloria Estefan. Start with the first link, then click through his several posts on the rally.

I want to know what the guy said. I want to see the media in this country in similar positions stand up for freedom of speech. I want to see a press that actually keeps the government in check, because, right now, in the US, everybody has a case of rectal CA because they're getting reamed pretty regular by Baghdad Bobby Gibbs and they haven't as much as looked cross eyed at the guy yet. Where is the accountability? Where are the freedom fighters? What happens when the press no longer agrees with Obama here.... or, will that ever come—I have a feeling that most of them are knee pad wearing gob slobberers and will continue to think that until proven otherwise.

Wow, who would have thought that a brilliant socialist hailed by western leftists, would do such a thing?

Besides every conservative.

Leftists are so damn predictable it gets boring.

Socialist utopias always turn out like this because every left wing idea is unworkable in practice.

Socialists get furious because human nature gets in the way of their brilliant ideas of how things are supposed to be.

At the heart of socialism is a deep hatred for human nature.

Conservatism, on the other hand, accepts that human nature is inherently flawed (by original sin) and attempts to mitigate that flaw.

Socialists first seeks to mold human nature into something new and better and then becomes enraged when they fail.

Run this story past a few of your "progressive" friends and listen as they spin away about how the guy "must have done something wrong" or Chavez "wouldn't have had him arrested." Listen as they tell you that such criticism isn't "real journalism," and such critics aren't "real journalists." Why, they foment violence! Some criticism Just. Can't. Be. Allowed. And when your progressive friends make these arguments — and they will — look them closely in the face. That's the face of evil in a totalitarian mind. Ordinary people who find such extraordinary tyranny so perfectly acceptable, desirable even, and the next thing you know 6 million of their countrymen are dead and they simply cannot understand why the world despises them. They had good intentions, you see. They were trying to "help people."

What does Tom Brokaw think of this? How about Perky Katie Couric? Is The New York Times sending someone down to aid their brother in the press? Will "60 Minutes" be doing an expose on the imprisonment of their fellow journalists in Venezuela, the "dissidents"?

All the fuss and fury has amounted to d*mn little success against him so far. He's got nothing to lose by letting his opponents paint themselves into a corner and blow off steam. He also has nothing to gain by jackbootery, unless the right's heros start openly calling for revolt.

Many of our media outlets have sold themselves to unrealistic lefty causes and cannot back down because it might force them to exhibit some humility and we can't have that. Same with Barack, all he had to do was, with sincerity!!!, say we're going to re-look at this and see if other ways to reach a better end might be achievable. No way!! His way/that way is the only way and tough luck. I wonder if he'll ever have the good grace to admit this even to himself when he's staring up into the dark before he falls asleep. Only the most seriously damaged of men such as Nero, Stalin, Kim Jung, Castro, Pilate et al et al are the types who cannot admit this even to themselves. Not meaning to say he is these, but is of that mold of man who lacks the humility to acknowledge a mistake or even seem to notice that mistake's consequences. The mark of a bad leader.
